The metabolism of amoxicillin by a cytochrome P450 3A4-mediated oxidation was investigated in blood, liver microsomes and gastric juice with the aim to confirm the identity of the amoxicillin metabolites detected in vivo. The analysis of the digested samples revealed a significant decrease in the concentration of amoxicillin and its metabolites after gastric acidification. The N-acetyl-amoxicillin dihydrochloride was the major metabolite in human blood, regardless of the enzyme source (human, rat, or rabbit), the incubation time and the species (human, rat, or rabbit). The same compound was also obtained in gastric juice. The concentration of dihydroamoxicillin in human blood was about ten times higher than the concentration of amoxicillin. When amoxicillin was incubated in rabbit liver microsomes (70 microM amoxicillin) under anaerobic conditions, three metabolites were detected. Oxidative metabolism was preferred (44% of the total metabolites compared to 24% for N-acetylation) and 2,4-dihydroxy-amoxicillin was the most abundant metabolite. In human and rat liver microsomes (6 h incubation), a different profile was observed. Oxidation was present but N-acetylation dominated (45 and 47% respectively). The identity of the most relevant amoxicillin metabolites formed by human microsomes and liver homogenates has been confirmed by LC-MS analysis.Priming of Trichophyton rubrum in vitro: effects of mycological and ultrastructural changes. The priming of Trichophyton rubrum in vitro with endogenous (digestive enzymes) and exogenous (lipase) enzymes influences conidial release, germination and ultrastructure. Changes in conidial surface structure were seen in the presence of exogenous lipase but not endogenous enzymes. Conidial release occurred within 30 min in the presence of both lipase preparations. No conidial release was detected in the absence of the enzyme. The results demonstrate that conidial release and germination occur within a specific time frame. Both endogenous and exogenous enzymes can induce morphological changes b7e8fdf5c8
